WAYNE POCIUS hunts exclusively with his Steyr-made rifle using 180 grain bullets for this safari.

RONNIE SPARROW is a citizen of Zimbabwe and licensed as a professional hunter in Zambia, Zimbabwe, and South Africa.

The Bangweulu Swamps area of Zambia is in northern Zambia, east of Lake Bangweulu, and about 300 air miles northeast of the capital city of Lusaka.

The first two animals hunted are the Oribi and Tsessebe which are both found on the grasslands surrounding the flood plains.

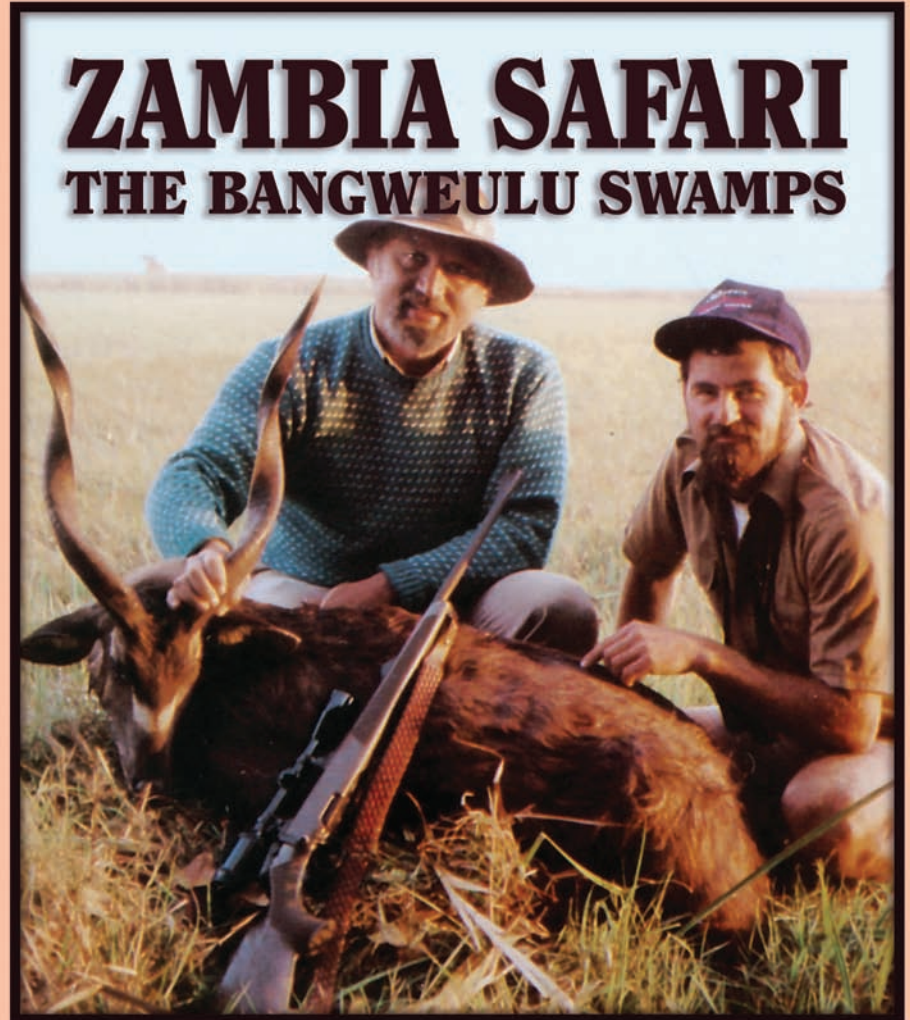

The Bangweulu Swamps are the only place in the world where the Black Lechwe exists. Only the male has horns, which are ringed and lyre-shaped, with 23 inches considered to be a good trophy. In order to increase the chances for an excellent specimen, Wayne and Ronnie and a skeleton staff move to a fly camp. The reward is that Wayne is able to take a beautiful 26 incher on-camera.

Then the hunting begins for one of Africa's greatest trophies: the ghost of the swamps, the legendary Zambezi Situngu, an aquatic antelope that lives in the swamps. The males have horns with two keels and up to two spirals. As a defense mechanism, Situngu can actually submerge with only their nostrils above water.

Situngu are difficult to hunt and rarely photographed. But Wayne and Ronnie move their camp into the swamps and several Situngu are filmed before Wayne takes a magnificent specimen on-camera.
